Source: Anbima, B3, Bloomberg, Itaú BBA. (*) Incentivized debentures

Methodology: To compare Brazilian corporate bonds in BRL and USD terms, we estimate the USD-equivalent yield for local bonds using the FX coupon curve published by B3. For CDI-linked bonds, we take the quoted spread over CDI, while for inflation-linked bonds we derive the real yield spread over the sovereign curve using ANBIMA's inflation-linked term structure and then convert it to USD via the FX coupon curve. USD bonds are valued using Bloomberg mid-YTM, assuming hold-to-maturity and excluding embedded options, while BRL bonds rely on ANBIMA reference prices, which may differ from actual trading levels. It is worth noting that incentivized debentures typically trade tighter when compared with traditional debentures, because of tax exemption that benefits the individual investors.

This approach is an approximation and does not reflect the full economics of implementing a cross-currency swap. Transaction costs, margin requirements, and liquidity constraints are not considered, and results may vary depending on trade size and counterparty conditions. Tax implications beyond the gross-up adjustment are excluded and should be assessed individually. The analysis uses market-close data and assumes static curves, making it suitable for relative value comparison rather than executable strategies.
